Manufacturers may be held liable for defective toys or other children's products that caused injuries even if they were not negligent. Retailers may also be held liable for any injuries the product caused if they were aware or should have known that the product was defective and they failed to protect their customers.

Toys and other children's products can be found defective in the following ways:

- Design defects
- Defects in manufacturing
- Incorrect or incomplete instructions
- Failure to honor a warranty
- Missing or incomplete warning (i.e. choking hazard)

The Consumer Products Safety Commission is the government agency that is responsible for keeping the public informed about the serious risks that consumer products, including children's products, pose. They maintain a list of defective toys and other children's products that have been recalled because of a defect, such as improper design, lead-based paint, malfunctioning components and manufacturing defects.

If your child has suffered injuries that were caused by a dangerous or defective toy or other children's product, Romanucci & Blandin's product liability attorneys will help you through the legal process and fight to get you the compensation you deserve.
