Doubt about police in Chicago manifests itself on racial lines in monitor's survey, legal challenges over street stops

Chicago Tribune | September 25, 2020

Chicago had its own watershed moment on policing and racism with the 2014 shooting of Black teenager Laquan McDonald by a white officer later convicted of second-degree murder, touching off efforts for sweeping reform. But a recent community survey on policing here that is part of that effort points to a continuing, wide racial divide between how Black and white residents view cops, including a persistent issue: the street stop.
